Is Wealth Right Or Wrong? The Illuminati Order and Criminal Law Reform in Late 18th Century Germany

There are many controversial views about the secret society of the Illuminati. Did they want political overthrow? Or were they only moderately reformist? In reality there existed great differences between the individual local groups of the order. The lecture will focus on the Illuminati group of Erfurt, whose activity is very well documented through minutes, letters and lectures. It consisted partly of lawyers, who dared to go a long way with their opinions in the secret documents, much further than they publicly stated. They blaspheme in a downright militant manner about the mentality of the rich merchants and call for a reform of criminal law that takes into account the constraints of the poor population. Theft out of poverty should not be considered as a crime, but as a reminder to the city to distribute its funds more fairly. The lawyers are influenced by the Erfurt hunger crisis of 1771; they are at the same time schooled in Beccaria, but also in an Origenist theology of goodness. Thus, the Illuminati order shows itself to have been a protected space for discussion, in which political ideas could thrive that were not yet possible in public.

Lejon eller lo? Rätt och fel i det sena 1700-talets naturgestaltning

Den tvärvetenskapliga forskargruppen presenterar projektet ”Cool Nature: Utopian Landscapes in Sweden 1780–1840”. Utgångspunkten är kontrasten mellan den kulturella koden – som byggs upp på medelhavsklimatets locus amoenus och på förekomsten av lejon och lagerträd – och den faktiska svenska naturen – med älge, lodjur och granskog. Hur samsas dessa naturtyper i tidens poesi, sång, bildkonst, scenkonst, medicinska och religiösa litteratur, och i den nationella diskursen? Hur förhåller sig dessa naturtyper till diskussioner om genus och nationell identitet? Vid vilka tillfällen, och varför, betraktas dessa naturtyper, ideal och verklighet, som normala respektive avvikande? Vilken utopisk potential tilldelas naturen i det sena 1700-talet?

God and devil in Norway 1650-1800 – from cosmic battle to the almighty God, and on to the almighty state

In the more than 50 000 pages of transcribed court records from the western part of Norway, we find more than 1000 references to God and devil. When analysing these references we find a distinct change in the popular view of the supernatural, and its place in and effect on everyday life. However, the references to God and devil can also be used to understand the development of the Danish-Norwegian state under the absolute sovereign king from 1660 to 1814, and how religious changes can be said to have prepared the transmission from absolutism to democracy.

Right and Wrong Ways of Knowing: Knowledge Conflicts in Eighteenth-Century Europe

The eighteenth century – the Age of Enlightenment – was seething with concerns about knowledge: the progress of useful arts and sciences, the stabilization and scientific refinement of vernacular languages, the diffusion of information, the spread of education, not to mention the continuous metaphysical debates about the nature, potential, and limits of man's reason and understanding, as well as about the possibilities of obtaining absolute, certain knowledge of the worldly and the divine.

In this talk, however, I will focus on more down-to-earth discussions about learning and knowing. Over the eighteenth century, numerous educators, writers, and journalists engaged in conversations about what and how to read, study, understand, and remember within various branches of knowledge and societal spheres. They also debated how to construct aids that could facilitate learning for the young, poor, lazy, busy, and ungifted. In these conversations, older norms of what constituted “right” and “wrong” ways of knowing were challenged on multiple fronts. In my talk, I will explore some of these conflict lines, delving into examples from educational treatises, learned journals, and prefaces in several languages, from the late seventeenth century to the end of the eighteenth. Among other things, I will argue that the explosive popularity of dictionaries (i.e., alphabetically-organized reference works) was part of a wider renegotiation of what counted as a respectable way of knowing: that is, to know a little about a lot, rather than a lot about a little, and – to quote Immanuel Kant – “having the courage to use one’s own understanding”.

Individet og den tvingende stat

Årtierne frem mod 1800 var rammen om en lang række reformer og institutionelle udviklinger vedrørende rets- og straffepraksis. Centralt stod overvejelser og ængsteligheder ved de tvangssformer staten brugte til at kontrollere og forme individer fra samfundets nederste lag. Perioden var præget af både forandring og kontinuitet, fremfor klare, lineære moderniseringssprocesser. Rationalerne og logikkerne bag statens institutioner blev omdefineret og forhandlet igen og igen – både under indflydelse af nye idéer, men også som reaktion på handlinger gjort af de samfundsgrupper og individer som institutionerne rettede sig imod.

Panelets tre papers udforsker sådanne dynamikker og logikker med udgangspunkt i tre forskellige institutioner: Inkvisitionskommissionen, hvor torturen havde sin guldalder på trods af vedvarende politisk afstandstagen; Tugt-, Rasp- og Forbedringshuset på Christianshavn, der med sin brogede skare af indsatte var ubekvemt placeret imellem forsorg og kriminalitetsbekämpelse; og det såkaldte “slaveri”, der bestod i fængsler for mandlige forbrydere placeret i Stokhuset i København eller på landets fæstninger, hvor fangernes flugtmønstre skabte utryghed ved straffeformernes rationaler. Tilsammen udgjorde disse tre institutioner statens måske vigtigste værn imod de individer, der betragtedes som særligt farlige: mordere, voldsforbrydere, desertører og tyve. De danner således et vindue til mødet mellem det tvungne individ og en stat i udvikling.

Beyond Rules? Getting it ‘Right’ in the Eighteenth-Century Novel

The novel in the eighteenth century is considered a new genre, and an author might feel “at liberty to make what laws I please therein”, as we read in Henry Fielding’s Tom Jones (1749). Novelists, Fielding included, however constantly related themselves to the body of neoclassical “rules of poetics” developed for ancient genres like tragedy and the epic, as well as to the heritage of the ancient novel. In this lecture, I will discuss the dynamics between applying and transgressing these poetic rules in the work of novelists of the Cervantine tradition, like Henry Fielding and Christoph Martin Wieland, in order to outline how authors attempted to establish new standards of getting it “right” for a modern genre that defines itself as standing beyond the rules.

Canoes, Cobles, Bum Boats and Fugitives: Maritime Marronage in the Lesser Antilles

The history of maritime marronage in the eighteenth-century Caribbean has focused on port towns, Atlantic vessels, and enslaved men. In these towns, enslaved men could find cover among the large transient populations of sailors, soldiers, and free people of color. With captains hungry for crew, enslaved men could pass as deckhands or sailors, blending in with the motley crew of ocean-going vessels. It is a story of opportunities grasped by single men in pursuit of freedom.

In this lecture, I tell another story. A story of how the small open boats – the canoes, periagoes, bum boats, cobles, and yawls – that connected the islands of the Lesser Antilles afforded a different escape practice. In contrast to the flight opportunities provided by the Atlantic fleet, the smaller boats catered to the needs of women, children, young, old, rural and urban. Indeed, small craft made rural sugar estates part of a fugitive geography that spanned the Lesser Antilles and afforded the collective organization of escape. Small craft marronage is a story of families and friends seeking survival on islands nearby.
